THE CLEAN BUCKET

Nya stood by the edge of a pond, a bucket in her hand. As part of her training to become the Ninja of Water, Sensei Wu had instructed her to clean the bucket. Sure, the bucket was covered in mud, but what was the point of this chore? How would cleaning a bucket make her a better ninja?

Nya sighed, then kneeled down and got to work. Underneath all the mud, the bucket was old and battered, but solid. After an hour, she'd managed to remove every last speck of dirt.

I hope my next lesson will be more interesting, Nya thought.

Back inside the tea shop, she showed the bucket to Sensei Wu. He looked at it, and then looked back at her.

"Bring me a clean bucket," said Sensei Wu.

"But it is clean . . . I just finished . . . what do you mean?" sputtered Nya. Sensei Wu turned and walked away.

Nya watched him go. Then she stomped back to the pond to start over.

She couldn't help thinking about all the things she could be doing right now besides washing a bucket.

"Sensei Wu must've spotted some mud I missed. I guess the best thing to do is start over," she muttered.

Nya scrubbed and she polished and she scrubbed again. When she was done, the bucket was so clean she could eat off it. And Nya proceeded to do just that.

She turned the bucket over and used it as a table for her lunch.

After lunch, she handed the bucket to the Sensei. To her dismay, he handed it right back, saying simply, "Bring me a clean bucket."

Nya sat down on the ground with the bucket in front of her. She stared hard at it. "All right, bucket, where did I go wrong? You don't look dirty, but if Sensei Wu says you are . . . I guess you must be."

Frustrated, Nya walked slowly back to the pond. The more she scrubbed, the angrier she grew.

"It doesn't matter what I do," she grumbled. "It's never going to be clean enough. If I can't clean a dumb bucket, how can I be a ninja?"

And, indeed, it seemed like she had failed again. When she brought the bucket back to Sensei Wu, he told her, "Bring me a clean bucket."

"Give me a hint," Nya said. "What am I missing?"

But Sensei Wu said nothing. So Nya headed back to the pond.

By now, she was starting to really hate this bucket. In fact, she couldn't bear to pick up a sponge and wash it again. So she grabbed an axe instead. "Maybe if I chop it up, it'll finally be clean enough," she muttered.

That thought made her stop in her tracks: Maybe Sensei Wu meant something different by "clean."

"'Clean' can mean pure of heart, but a bucket doesn't have a heart," she said to herself. "'Clean' can mean something made of a pure substance, but the bucket is made of pure wood. And I suppose something can be clean if it's brand-new . . ."

Nya smiled. That was it! She ran back to the tea shop and grabbed some tools. Then she quickly took the bucket apart, cleaned each piece, and then put it together again with brand-new nails.

"Same parts, new bucket," she said, beaming. "Let's see Sensei Wu say no to this!"

Nya hurried to show Sensei Wu her very, very clean bucket. Her face fell when he shook his head. "Bring me a—" he began.

"Enough!" Nya yelled in frustration, hurling the bucket to the ground. "It's clean! It was clean six hours ago! What is it you want?"

Sensei Wu smiled gently. "Just what you have given me."

"Huh?" said Nya.

"The bucket was clean when you first brought it back to me, and you knew that in your heart," her teacher replied. "But you did not trust yourself, so when I expressed doubt, you began to doubt as well. And so you cleaned the bucket again and again, rather than trust your own senses."

"So if I had stood up for what I knew to be true . . . ?" Nya said.

"You would not have spent the entire day cleaning a bucket," Sensei Wu answered. "You have learned your lesson for the day. Now it is time for some tea. But . . . um . . ."

"What?" Nya groaned.

"We are all out of fresh water. Could you possibly take this bucket and go down to the well—"

Fortunately for the sensei, Spinjitzu Masters are very good at dodging thrown buckets.
